James Cropper is a name synonymous with industry in South Lakeland, a company that proudly traces a direct line of paper manufacturing heritage in the district back to 1753.

Croppers, as they are affectionately referred to, are one of the world's foremost manufacturers of specialist and highly coloured papers and supply a customer base spanning more than 50 countries with a product range which includes everything from papers for books and bindings, to picture framing and archival grades, to papers and board for premium packaging of luxury goods.

Most famously, James Cropper manufacture the bright red paper stock for the Royal British Legion's poppies, produced each year in remembrance of those from the armed forces that have lost their lives in wars and conflicts.

The first James Cropper took over the Burneside and Cowan Head mills in 1845 (the former site having been a paper-making mill since 1753 and which was still a manufacturing site for the company until 1977). Since then, six generations of the Cropper family have been at the helm, with Mark Cropper the current Chairman.

Phil Wild, CEO of James Cropper PLC, tells us more about the workforce: "Our company ethos is based on family values and hard work. The company strives for high standards in everything we do and a lot of this is down to a heritage of innovation, investment and resilience."

James Cropper, which became a publicly quoted company back in 1951, is still seen very much as an independent business and Mark Cropper, like his father, is still very much a hands-on Chairman.

Mark Cropper adds "Being involved in making things is intensely satisfying and the challenge of continuing to manufacture products that fit every parameter - safety, environment, customer needs and of course, profitability, ensures that our work will continue to challenge and evolve. James Cropper is renowned globally for its fine papers and advanced non-woven materials and we continue to make all our products in the English Lake District on the same site where we've been operating since 1845. We are proud of the fact that many aspects of our operations are truly world-class, reflecting our long term policy of continual investment."

Along with significant investment in machinery, staff and the Burneside manufacturing site, James Cropper have also ensured they stay at the front of innovation within their industry in terms of process technology and colour science.

With customers demanding ever greater choice (ranging from matching the colour of a leaf to intensely coloured board suitable for direct contact with food), so the development team rise to the challenge. With deep colours being a signature of Croppers, so their library boasts over 3,500 shades and computerised matching of another 12,700.

A company which has also embraced and encouraged diversification, in 1985 James Cropper PLC formed Technical Fibre Products, a wholly owned subsidiary company based alongside the main Mill but who are far removed from the traditional paper-making next door.

Technical Fibre Products specialise in the development and manufacture of advanced non-woven mats and veils using mineral fibres such as carbon, aramids, ceramics and micro-fine glass for applications in high-tec industrial sectors such as aerospace, electronics, fire protection and energy.

To meet the demands of this ever-evolving sector and an increasing customer-base, Technical Fibre Products has established a sales team and specialist manufacturing facilities in North America where over 50% of its products are sold.

As a producer of niche, high quality and high performance products, James Cropper PLC continues to lead the field and today is "the UK's only truly bespoke and independent speciality paper and advanced materials manufacturer."
